What is APD?

Auditory processing Disorder (APD) is an umbrella term for a group of disorders that can result in a breakdown in the hearing process. The brain struggles to make sense of and process the sounds we hear because the auditory signal is being delayed in some way, ie. a child can hear well in quiet situations, but has trouble understanding what is said in noisy, classroom environments.

APD affects 5% of school aged children. The APD test battery results are integrated and compared to normative data to determine diagnosis. APD assessment and discussion of strategies and management can take up to 2 hours. A comprehensive report is provided for parents, teachers and any specialist required.
